For the time being from Governor Smith, we must present a solution. The prohibition is the only real friend of the liquor traffic. I am personally the driver of the whole lot, but I cannot and will not tolerate a condition such as prohibition has imposed.

BOSTONIAN IN RESCUE MISSION

"McCarthy - Franklin" Had Several Girls, Says Spouse,
but is No Polygamist

Admitting that "girls may have been numerous" in the career of Joseph McCarthy, Franklin, Boston rescue mission worker, Mrs. Pearl Franklin of Roxbury, today steadfastly refused to credit the statement of Mrs. Agnes McCarthy of Roxbury and Manchester, N. H., that he has eight living, undivorced wives.

While Mrs. Agnes McCarthy is not trying to sound like a "witness" when she has not yet been able to identify her husband, Mrs. Franklin remains faithful to the alleged polygamist.

MRS. HUN IN AID.

"No matter what the authorities believe, I will remain true to him," she declared. "I told me the truth about the others. I divorced his first wife, Isabelle Quinn of Canton, and his marriage to Agnes was illegal, he said. The rest he doesn't know at all."

"The name of Agnes to say he has eight wives! She is trying to ruin my husband's name," said McCarthy. "I was originally arrested on charges of deserting Mrs. Agnes McCarthy but an investigation disclosed other 'wives' in his life and he was held for the Grand Jury."

IN RESCUE WORK.

"We have our rescue mission in common, for I am interested in that welfare work just as he is. That is how we met and that is why we find so much in common to keep us together. He will be exonerated sooner or later."

Mrs. Franklin asserts that Franklin is her husband's right name, although she never told him so. McCarthy was originally arrested on charges of deserting Mrs. Agnes McCarthy but an investigation disclosed other "wives" in his life and he was held for the Grand Jury.

Son Russell at "Family" Meeting; Parents Deny He Was in Escapade

Atlantic City, N. J., June 5 (I.N.S.).—Harry K. Thaw, Evelyn Nesbit, his former wife, and Russell Thaw, her 15-year-old son, are apparently reunited.

Diners at a local hotel could hardly believe their eyes when they saw the trio dining together. It was the first time that the little family, whose troubles have been aired in the courts for nearly two decades, had ever broken bread together.

Word of the reunion swept over the Boardwalk like wildfire. Through followed Thaw when the millionaire and his former wife left the hotel, and went to a cafe on the beach, where they sat at a round table and engaged in earnest conversation. Thaw showed her married attention. HAVE "BRED" HATCHET.

Evelyn has repeatedly denied that she would ever take Harry back, but many conjectures were drawn from the meeting. Although neither Miss Nesbit nor Thaw would discuss the report that they had met to effect a reconciliation, Miss Nesbit said they had "buried the hatchet."

"We buried the hatchet and decided not to fight any more," she declared.

The immediate cause of the meeting, they said, was to frame a denial of a story from Chicago that 18-year-old youth named Russell Thaw, an interesting girl friend with lavish parties at the Congress Hotel and had disappeared leaving a wake of ill.

Russell has not been in Chicago since we left there last January," Miss Nesbit said. "Furthermore, he never stopped at the Congress Hotel."

REUNION IS HINTED.

She declared her attorney would start suit for damages against the hotel company.

Miss Nesbit has been appearing at the Police Bureau, a local night club, after meeting with Thaw, as their second in a short time, and there are rumors of an amicable settlement.

"We are very friendly," Thaw said after the dinner.

SMILE COSTS HIM $200;

When the matter was brought to the attention of the court Roy asked for a continuance until June 5.

He got it, with bail set at $500. But he looked too pleased.

"What are you smiling at?" queried Judge Hayden.

"I'm smiling at your honor. Merely nodding to a friend," he said.

"You'll never get your bond $500," said his honor.

Roy "ain't gonna smile no more."

SHRINERS' BOAT IN DOCK CRASH

The crash of their steamer against another at the Army Base dock and the steamer report of a missing hawser, awakened 200 returning Shriner today as they arrived home from the Philadelphia sesquicentennial celebration.

The Monitor liner American Legion, which brought them to Boston, had difficulty docking, due to extremely low water and a strong tide. The tug, which was in the dock, and at one time broke out of control and swung straight across the steamer's path in the channel.

Damage to the freighter was slight, though she was struck amidships by the prow of the liner. The crew of the Golden Gate assisted the big boat to the up, and after the excitement was over, the awakened shriners returned to their berths for a little more sleep. They left the ship later in small groups and without wearing their colorful parade uniforms.

DEPEW WILL NOT ATTEND 'REUNION OF ONE'

New York, June 5 (A.P.).—Chambers Depew, A. B. M. A., LL.D., Yale '64, will not attend the seventieth reunion of his class at Yale on June 21, he said today, because it would be no reunion at all, he being the only "hale and hearty" one left of the hundred who graduated.

In his office the chairman of the New York Central's directors sat at his desk reading telegrams, cables and letters.

"I'm hale and hearty," he said. "I'm also his. Doctor's orders are that the commencement exercises making a speech and all that you know, would be too much for me."

"There are other survivors of the class, I think. Dr. Virgil Marco Dow in New Haven. But he's too feeble to be about. Oh, yes, there's another, too, Buckle, James Lyman Buckle, up in Portland. Me, I haven't heard from him for some time, though. I suppose he's gone, too."

But Mr. Buckle is very much alive and promises to be at the reunion if able. He is in his two years younger than Dr. Depew.

Society Out in Force for Waveney Farm Show

MILLWOOD HUNT'S BIG TWO-DAY HORSE SHOW ended its first day with flying colors, and today completes its record-breaking spectacle when eighteen or more hunt teams of three riders each come out for the Waveney Farm Cup, riders to be in full hunt costume.

FOR THE FIRST DAY, a sky superbly blue, a ring never more green set in a natural amphitheatre, and throughout the day every eye inclined toward open did horse flesh combined to provide unforgettable pictures for a large and appreciative gallery.

SOCIETY WITHIN THE RING received the plaudits of society outside the ring—George B. West, Jr., riding Bayard Tuckerman, Jr.'s "Little Dalby" to victory; Miss Barbara Welch (pretty substitute daughter of Mrs. E. S. Fisher Welch) and Miss Elizabeth Sprague, riding her "Chocolate Soldier," and "Crimson Banner."

HENRY C. VAUGHAN, M. F. H., and Nathaniel Thayer, both wearing Norfolk Hunt coats, Bay and Tuckerman, Alvin, Bartlett and Miss M. Appleton, carrying Miss Appleton, were seen over the out-side jump; Mrs. I. Tucker Burr and her "True Blue," and Richard Salsman with "Lucky" were but a few in the brilliant string.

MILLWOOD, HOWEVER, had no attraction for the coming season buds, whose heyday of pleasure was to be found at Mr. and Mrs. Lindsay Loring's lovely "Sunset Farm" at Westwood, when, at a triple affair—garden party, dinner and dance—they launched their substitute daughter, Miss Mary Loring.

THE RUD, "IN ROSE PINK" FROCK and drooping hat of the same tint, with her mother in delicate crepe of ashes of roses, received their guests under an old elm tree the guests of the day to greet this most important of the week was a company of Boston's best.

AND FROM GOTHAM CAME her cousin, Miss Lily Cushing, a bud, with her mother, the former Mrs. Howard Cushing, now Mrs. James Denison Cushing, and the two families—the Cushing, a daughter of the late Mr. Cushing, famous as a portrait painter, has hosts of highly placed relatives here, on both maternal and paternal sides.

In a natural wood setting, consultations for "Master" Rollins and for the "masters" of the school, and a goodly sum for the Newton Hospital, are pleasant and deserving results.

TAKING THE TRANSCATIAN. LEO TRAIL, to honeymoon pairs, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Cotling (Constance Hunsy) are today outward bound on the steamship Conte Rosso, their journey's end to be Italy. The Cotling-Hunsy marriage was celebrated Thursday, at Old Lyme, Ct.

EARLY TRIAL FOR 'RAP' CASE DEFENDANTS

Early trial of the men indicted in the "rap" investigation was promised today by District Attorney O'Brien, who announced that several of the cases will be assigned to the trial list during the coming week, with the trials following the summer adjournment of the Superior Court.

Grand Jury investigation of the alleged collusion between policemen, liquor vendors and others, which has already resulted in indictment of five police officers and four other men, will continue on a broadening scale, the district attorney said.

He refused to comment on where the lighting will strike the next in the sweeping probe of conditions in the various police divisions.

The two policemen most recently indicted are charged with accepting gifts to quash liquor prosecutions after a case reached a stage sufficiently serious to make the alleged bribery willing to "come across." The five men previously indicted were charged with conspiracy to extort.

Both Special Officer Arthur O'Shea and Special Officer John Sullivan, the last two named by the grand jury, are attached to the Dudley street station house.

BUDGET TALK No. 69
WHENEVER I see a traffic policeman, I am always reminded of our good friend Budget.

Just as the policeman holds back danger and clears a safe road for you, so Budget, too, holds back worry and clears the way for prosperity, independence and assured future to escort you along life's pathway.

Budget will make it possible for you to plan your money for the future, to show you how to spend it wisely, to tell you how to save it, and to show you how to use it to the best advantage.

It is a budget which is a plan for the future, a plan for the present, and a plan for the past. It is a plan for the future, a plan for the present, and a plan for the past.

MEDBURY SAYS--

By John P. Medbury

NOW that summer is just around the corner, traffic congestion is terrible. Half the people in the crowded streets are driving automobiles and the other half are looking for parking places.

EVERYBODY is driving everywhere and getting nowhere.

A SUNDAY afternoon drive now takes three days.

ONES follow went out for a week's tour and couldn't eat out all the time.

LOTS of firms are leaving the city earlier each year. Even after you get the car started there's no room to run it.

ONES say were out three machines last year trying to park them.

A BRIDE and groom bought a car the other day and got home just close to celebrate their first wedding anniversary.

CROSS town traffic is so slow that a lot of motorists are now taking their pajamas along with them.

YOU have to get there at night in order to cross the street in the morning.

ONES man said he had to drive down a road and watch his car go down.

HE used to wait on the corner so long that he had his mail sent by hand.

LAST year while he was standing at one corner three new bullhorns went up.

AND just as he got the signal to move several trucks were being thrown out for not paying their rent.

THE sheriff never bothers to stop each automobile any more. The people who own them can't move them anyway.

IT'S getting so bad that you have to know that it had anything but a second car.

A NEW YORK man owned a machine six months before he knew that it had anything but a second car.

HE'D go from first to second and from second to the repair shop.

HE drove down town the other morning and when he got to his office the car was covered with mud.

THE only way for a motorist to get anywhere nowadays is to take the car out of the garage, shut the motor off and walk.

THE only way to know that London is not so bad as it used to be is to see how bad it is now.

DAILY SHORT STORY

HER MOTHER

By Mabel McKee

THE Lamar home was a house divided. It had been divided five years when pretty Louise Lamar started buying the flimsy gorgeous things for her museum to marry David Littlefield.

Dr. William Lamar had continued to live in the big Lamar home, which had been made beautiful both inside and out by the hand of Mary, his wife. Every piece of the rich furniture in the house, every picture, the rug and china—were all her selection. While outside, the shrubbery and vines and masses of hydrangea and rambler roses had not only been chosen and the arrangement of them planned by her but the work of planting had been done by her own hands.

When the break came Mary Lamar went down to the very end of Budge street, the quietest street of the town and there bought herself a bungalow. She had been sure that she was going to live in a bachelor apartment with some of her friends almost under her heart, but she never objected to a job.

She grew to know that Louise married because she had not been her husband's heart around her still more when he married a striking young beauty and began to rush her around to the country club and try to make her the society leader of the town. But she kept very quiet and not for a long time did Louise even dream that the striking beauty was only the last of a long line of girls who had killed her mother's love for her father—the last of a long line of girls who had had an affair of which he boasted to the town.

While he did this, Mary walked quietly by herself and spent her hours making the lawn of the division. For his young wife demanded all his time. When Louise had come to his home, the young wife had been the very thing of her father's life. She had been the daughter of the house an intruder in his home. So now Louise visited with her father only occasionally and then in his office.

"Of course it will be so different when we're married and I have you to live over," Louise smiled across the table at David as he was eating a few minutes before the date set for their wedding. "You'll sort of take over the house."

She didn't notice that David looked at her hands and at his plate. She was too absorbed in planning the details of her wedding.

she hurt her, for they were blue reminders of the Lamar home before she had been divided. But she never complained nor confided that she was his friend.

Louise in all her speech was Louise to her mother, though her heart was not. In it she thought of her mother as a failure as she admitted that her mother had allowed her father to wander away from her. While he hungers for her old home grew and grew and at times made her almost bitter.

It had meant that she had to give up her handsome father—and this division. For his young wife demanded all his time. When Louise had come to his home, the young wife had been the very thing of her father's life. She had been the daughter of the house an intruder in his home. So now Louise visited with her father only occasionally and then in his office.

"Of course it will be so different when we're married and I have you to live over," Louise smiled across the table at David as he was eating a few minutes before the date set for their wedding. "You'll sort of take over the house."

She didn't notice that David looked at her hands and at his plate. She was too absorbed in planning the details of her wedding.

after dull business at all. Her brown eyes were eager then, she red lips parted. She was a pale green dress which made the gold and red in her hair very vivid. She was beautiful but David Littlefield didn't notice that. Even then he was thinking of the midnight for which he had a wild infatuation just then. Thinking and trying to frame sentences which wouldn't hurt and which would explain later.

But the sentence he seems to be telling of his love for the other girl was as blunt as could be. Truly Louise realized at last that she was being discarded for another girl—that she had been unable to hold David's love. She rose to her feet, but she choked them down, tears rose to her eyes but she bravely winked them back. And her lips, which wanted to quiver, were held bravely quiet.

"All right, David," she finally managed to say. "I understand. You needn't say any more."

Miserably she sat there a little longer, trying to act as if she was not wounded to the death. When David finally rose she rose automatically with him. She heard him say that he would take her to her apartment. Then she shook her head. "I'm not going back there," she said. "I think I want to go home."

Her eyes, looking into the mirror straight ahead of her, had seen in it eyes like the ones she had looked into many times—her mother's eyes—big and brown and full of the heart-break which was suffering. Now Louise could fashion that look. It was in her eyes and it told of heart-break.

"Mother," her heart whispered, "I want my mother."

"I'm going alone," her lips murmured. "David, goodbye."

Take a child who has been away from home for weeks, she then down stairs straight, flew into the fragment yard and rushed into the little room where a woman sat alone. Like a little child, she rushed into her arms. "Oh, Mother!" she cried. "David has left me for another girl. I'm alone."

Two hungry arms went around her. "Mother understands, darling," the second voice in the world whispered. "Baby, baby, my heart is breaking for you."

No other voice was the entire house of Lamar divided. The heart of the daughter at last knew that of her mother, because it knew the same mother.

Look Co's by Ted Look

America, says dental magazine, has become a candy eating nation—over 100 million loaves of sugar and thus serve as a substitute for wheat.

Why don't the reformers pass an amendment to the Constitution outlawing sweets, chewing gum and candy?

Then the country would be overrun by a day after tomorrow.

The time will come when you see business men lick their shoes, open their desks and slyly munch a piece of fudge.

Motor cars will be confiscated when a top finds a chocolate bar in the side pocket.

Telephone conversation a few years hence:

"Hello, this Charlie?"

"Yes, sir."

"Can you hurry along some gumdrops? We're having a party."

"Sorry. Haven't got any gumdrops. But I can bring you some good salt water taffy."

"That last taffy wasn't very good. My chemist said it was dish water taffy."

"Is that so? It was sold to me for salt water stuff—and the wrapper looked like genuine waste paper to me."

"I tell you I got—some gumdrops, jelly beans."

"Well, I'm getting $10 a dozen."

"Send me up five jelly beans."

Divorce In Turkey

POLYANDRY is rapidly becoming a thing of the past in Turkey, just as most of the old customs are giving way to newer, more Western ideas. Just as the felt hat is taking the place of the far too monogamy is replacing polyandry.

The enormous factor may have something to do with this change. For it is exceedingly difficult, even in Turkey, for a man to be able to afford more than one wife.

Early marriage was common, with the rule among the Turks, A girl is usually married at about twelve or thirteen and a boy at eighteen.

Of course, the number of these marriages are, of course, usually undertaken by the parents. The match is almost always a question of parental arrangement.

But, naturally enough, the bride brings no dowry with her. The husband must supply that. It is considered quite sufficient that the bride supply her own room.

However, the groom serves as a sort of hostage to guard against too hasty divorces. For when the wife is divorced, the husband must pay a large sum of money to the wife and her family. This is why divorce is so easy. It is in fact a matter of money.

The marriage ceremony in Turkey is a very simple affair. It is a religious ceremony. But it is a very simple matter to break this contract. The wife has only to say to her husband, "I divorce thee," and she is free. This is why divorce is so easy. It is in fact a matter of money.

The man who never divorces is a very rare thing in Turkey. It is a matter of money.
